The word Ascension, in modern English, refers to the Christian holy day of the celebration of the Ascension, where believers are expected to accept the ascension of Jesus to heaven and return with him. Birds that fit the definition are eagles, hawks, and falcons, with many others, such as owls, sea gulls, and swifts, being considered at least altitudinal migrants. Eagles Golden eagles One of the most obvious and well-known species of raptor known for its religious habits is the Golden Eagle. "Eagle" comes from the Latin word Aquila, meaning "eagle", which is derived from Greek (, %o, Ás), for "the bird which dwells in the air". For this reason, many birds of prey are known as "birds of prey", although the first bird to be described as such was the golden eagle. The Greek word Aquila means "eagle" and was first used to identify this species in antiquity. It is estimated there are around 5,000 pairs of golden eagles left. They commonly occur in meadows and woodlands in lowland and montane climates, with habitats ranging from high-altitude montane meadows to temperate mountain steppes, wetlands and along the coastal margins. Western Hemisphere North America has one of the highest populations of golden eagles. Canada has the most, with over 60,000 birds, while the United States has approximately 32,000.
